At one point he also represents prudence against exaltation of his fellow officer, a non-Carlist, a rather unique representation of a Carlist in literature. The design and construction instruments used by sixteenth-century military engineers were not materially different from the devices employed by contemporary topographers and architects to design and survey existing or stake-out new structures. It is as if a huge hand stemming from their esprit de corps guided the ideas and pen strokes originating in the minds and hands of its individual members.
